

ABSTRACT

Methods for measuring transporter activity using budding baculoviruses that do not express endogenous transporters on their 5 envelope have a low background level and can measure the target activity with a high sensitivity. Such methods can be used to measure functional changes due to transporter SNPs over a more extensive range of substrates, and can be applied to tailor-made therapies.